STONES UNDER FRUIT TREES,-While on a Trit was suggested that something of this sort would be appropriate for an inscription on a stone erected to commemorate a railroad catastrophe:

wisit at Cape Cod, a year or two since, my attention was called to an orchard of apple troes. The owner was a retired sea captain, who, in early life planted the trees, that he might eat the fruit when on the retired list. At the time of planting out the trees, he secured the services of an old scotch gardener. The trees were healed in, the location for planting staked out, and Upward cars being rather late Downward cars declined to wait.
Dash, smash, crash, shricks, yells and grosss.
Scattered brains and splintered bones,

A tooth of some extinct monster was found near Lafayette, Ind., a few days since. It weighed two pounds and over. A similar and on the return of the proprietor he discovery was made in Fountain county about the same time. A portion of the jaw bone of some mastedon was found which the captain thought he had played soldier," and discharged him. The balance measured 3 feet long and 1 foot at the widest were set out as trees sometimes are, (where the blame is laid to the surserymen,) as now, after forty years, those four tree give more fruit than all the remainder.-Rural New Yorker.
